Could pothole professors help fix the city's roads?

Mayoral race ramping up. Bowman wants universities to help solve infrastructure problems

COLIN FAST
winnipeg@metronews.ca

Pothole professors at Winnipeg universities and colleges could be asked to help solve city problems if Brian Bowman is elected mayor next month.

In an announcement at the University of Manitoba, Bowman outlined a plan to engage post-secondary institutions, which includes funding a research chair in municipal infrastructure at the U of M and setting up a panel of experts to provide advice on the issue.

"When you have world-class resources in your city, I think you should use them," he said. "I want to get the message out that post-secondary matters, and it matters to the City of Winnipeg, and I want to do whatever I can to support the good work being done here."

Bowman says he has spent a lot of time at the U of M during the campaign and is excited about youth interest in the mayor's race.

But several nearby students weren't even aware a civic election was taking place, and few of them could name a single candidate for mayor.

In a poll taken by Probe Research last week, Bowman had five per cent support among 18- to 34-year-olds.

Bowman's five-point plan

- Fund a research chair in municipal infrastructure at the U of M
- Create an expert panel to advise on infrastructure issues
- Establish a mayor's scholarship program
- Expand internship opportunities within the civic administration
- Partner with institutions on community revitalization projects

Second phase of transit plan too costly: Steeves

Five per cent tax hike. Candidate says he'll kill phase two if elected

ELISHA DACEY
elisha.dacey@metronews.ca

Gord Steeves says the second phase of rapid transit is going to cost Winnipeggers too much money and promised to stop it if elected.

The mayoral candidate continued his targeted needling against frontrunner Judy Wasylycia-Leis on Thursday, standing in an empty field near the Parker Lands, where the second leg of bus rapid transit will run.

Steeves challenged Wasylycia-Leis to come up with concrete numbers to back up her support of the project, which he says will cost over and above her already promised three per cent tax increase over the four years of her term.

Based on current projections, Steeves said the city would pay out $354 million in construction costs by 2019.

After that, he said, and starting in 2020, the city will pay a total $236 million or more in annual maintenance payments over the course of 30 years — averaging out to $19.7 million in maintenance costs annually.

"This amounts to roughly a five per cent tax increase to be implemented in 2020 and held in place every year for 30 straight years," he says.

"All of this assumes the project will come in on budget. If it goes over budget, the numbers will be worse," he added.

Steeves said he was supportive of the first phase of rapid transit but he believes the second phase needs to be scrapped and debated, calling the second phase route a mistake.

"Building something that I believe is imperfect can't be the answer," he said, noting he initially supported the second phase when it ran straight down Pembina Highway, which he acknowledged has its own challenges.

BRT 'boondoggle' must be stopped: Sanders

The city's planned second phase of rapid transit is an unnecessary, wasteful and fraudulent project — the definition of a boondoggle, David Sanders said Thursday.

The mayoral candidate, who delivered a scathing assessment of the $590-million project during a press conference at the Fort Garry Hotel, said he has been closely following the "shape-shifting" plan since March 2013.

"During the past year-and-a-half, I have been pointing out the grave shortcomings of this complicated scheme," said Sanders, who also proposed a new rail-lines relocation study if elected.

"It appears that council has been hoodwinked into going out of its way to provide glorified express bus service to assist certain land developers."

This wasn't the first time Sanders has brought up his concerns over BRT: he has often spoken at committee and general council meetings, most recently about the extra $20 million per year that the city will have to pay over 30 years on the loan.

Mayoral candidate David Sanders shows media on Thursday a City of Winnipeg map of the second phase of rapid transit.

BERNICE PONTANILLA/METRO

"Council has so far made no attempt to say where the city's new $20 million will come from each year," he said, adding that while he would halt the second phase, he would find a way to develop "real rapid transit."

Sanders echoed the sentiments of other municipal candidates and some current councillors who believe that the dogleg route through the Parker Lands is the wrong way to go.

However, city officials have stated that the alternative Letellier rail-line route along Pembina Highway isn't wide enough to accommodate buses and light rail would be too expensive.

BERNICE PONTANILLA/METRO

Wasylycia-Leis' plan to pay for BRT expansion unclear

Judy Wasylycia-Leis went from the driver's seat to the hot seat in the mayor's race on Thursday.

The frontrunner in two recent opinion polls struggled to explain how she plans to pay for the $20-million annual cost of expanding the bus rapid-transit system during a campaign stop at city hall.

Wasylycia-Leis said the half-finished busway to the University of Manitoba was "one of the most embarrassing situations in Canada" and committed to completing the project.

But when pressed by reporters for details on her financing strategy, she initially said she'd "sit down with the senior administrators and city council to flesh out the plan," then suggested her proposed tax increase could help pay for it, then pledged to "find efficiencies at city hall" and finally promised to "roll out more details" later in the campaign.

Wasylycia-Leis has been under attack by competitor Gord Steeves over the past week for her plan to raise property taxes and her connections to the provincial NDP.

Earlier, Wasylycia-Leis pledged that a third of her proposed tax increase would be used to fund front-line services like police, fire, garbage collection and snow removal, and the remaining two-thirds would be dedicated to local and regional roads. The plan is similar to city council's current tax-increase plan.

She also said she would hold a public review of snow-clearing policy, buy more equipment to thaw frozen pipes and improve training for 311 operators.

Death of five-year-old

Tories call for action on inquiry's recommendations

Manitoba's Tories say they want immediate action on the recommendations from an inquiry into the death of a five-year-old girl.

Family-services critic Ian Wishart said the consultants examining how to put the 62 recommendations from the Phoenix Sinclair inquiry into practice are scheduled to report back at the end of the month.

The Tories want to make sure that the report doesn't just sit on the desk of Child and Family Services Minister Kerri Irvin-Ross, he said.

"We think the recommendations of the Sinclair inquiry by Justice (Ted) Hughes were very good. We get little accountability with regards to this, so we really want to get some action."

Phoenix bounced in and out of foster care, suffering abuse at the hands of her mother and stepfather, before she died from her injuries in 2005. Her death was not discovered for months while her mother continued to collect child subsidy cheques. An inquiry found that Manitoba's welfare system fundamentally failed to protect the girl and support her family.

A spokeswoman for Irvin-Ross said the province has made hundreds of changes to the child welfare system since then.

"We announced in January that 31 of Commissioner Hughes' recommendations are already being implemented," Rachel Morgan said in a statement.

"We've hired an independent consulting firm to develop an implementation plan for the remaining 31 recommendations. When we receive the plan, we will begin acting on it."

Paula Havixbeck pledges more police in schools

School resource officers. Currently available in three urban divisions, Havixbeck would expand program

BERNICE PONTANILLA
bernice.pontanilla@metronews.ca

Winnipeg parents would opt for having police officers in schools, rather than having their potholes filled, mayoral candidate Paula Havixbeck said on Thursday.

The Charleswood-Tuxedo councillor pledged her support for school resource officers (SRO), adding that if elected, she'd expand the program to all divisions, not just the current three.

"Safety is still a primary concern in a lot of areas, and parents will keep the pothole if they know that their kids are safe at schools, so I think it's a matter of priorities," she said during an early afternoon press conference at city hall.

"It takes political will to want to make it happen. I've heard from lots of schools, I've heard from private schools that want to have access to it."

Havixbeck has long been an advocate for the SRO program, which currently functions in the Winnipeg, Pembina Trails and St. James-Assiniboia school divisions, and believes the city should look at funding from corporate sponsorships, like Calgary does.

She also said the cost to add three more schools would be $300,000, since the other two-thirds would be covered equally between the provincial government and the school division.

"Rather than think of them as armed police officers in schools, I think we need to think of them as a resource for young people, people in areas who might be swayed by gang activities," she said.

"They provide a positive role model for students, and for some students this is the only positive contact that some have with police officers in their lives."

University of Manitoba. Five schools now under direction of one faculty

Students in the schools of medicine, dentistry, nursing, pharmacy and rehabilitation sciences at the University of Manitoba are now under the direction of one faculty.

All five departments have been rolled into the new Faculty of Health Sciences, which will have about 900 members.

Dr. Brian Postl, dean of the new faculty, says the merger will result in a team-based approach to training, which will improve patient care.

Postl says the move will help save money and eventually lead to a new nurse training facility at the downtown Health Sciences Centre.

Inquiry. Protesters camped at legislature for action on missing, murdered women

Dozens of people are camped in the shadow of Manitoba's legislature, calling for an inquiry into missing and murdered aboriginal women.

The group of about 40 people set up tents across the street from the legislature a week ago, protesting the federal government's refusal to hold an inquiry.

Kylo Prince says the abuse of aboriginal women is a continuation of genocide in Canada and has to stop.

However, he added that the camp is celebrating because the government has said it is willing to hold a roundtable discussion about missing and murdered aboriginal women.

They're 360 strong, speak 32 languages and are ready to be the Canadian Museum for Human Rights' "thread of energy."

Stuart Murray, the museum's president and CEO, led Thursday's presentation of its volunteer corps, telling media and guests that they received an "overwhelming" response from Winnipeggers when the call for volunteers first went out.

"That's really a reflection, I think, about the excitement that has been steadily growing about this museum," he said, adding the volunteers will be the "thread of energy" that ties all the CMHR stories together for the public.

"Canadians are embracing this new national museum, and let me tell you, folks: the world is taking notice."

The museum's volunteers will be tasked with guiding tours, interacting with visitors, assisting with special events, administrative support and educational programming.

Volunteer Bill Stannard, who retired from careers as a Protestant minister and computer-systems analyst, said he was moved to write a poem in honour of the museum's Garden of Contemplation.

"Come sit with me; silently we will share our joys," Stannard's poem began, before switching tone to the sharing of sorrows.

Denise Bukowski, volunteer services manager, said finding and interviewing the volunteers was a "daunting task" but there was help from the Manitoba Association for Volunteer Administration, the Royal Bank and the University of Manitoba's Asper School of Business.

Flu vaccine supply to fall short by 2 million

GSK. Canada's largest source will be unable to fill about 30% of its 2014-15 commitment

GSK, Canada's largest flu vaccine supplier, won't be able to fill about 30 per cent of its Canadian order for the upcoming 2014-15 flu season, the company said Thursday.

It also suggested the problems at its production facility in Ste. Foy, Que., may have an impact on its ability to supply vaccine to the U.S. market from that plant this season.

GlaxoSmithKline, which now goes by the name GSK, said problems in this year's production run have left it with a shortfall of about two million doses. The company was slated to provide nearly 6.4 million doses, 53 per cent of Canada's total purchase of about 12 million doses.

The Public Health Agency of Canada said it has secured 1.2 million additional doses of vaccine from other manufacturers which have a portion of the country's flu vaccine supply contract. Those companies are Sanofi Pasteur, Novartis and MedImmune, which is owned by AstraZeneca.

The Public Health Agency's statement, sent via email, suggested there may be delays in the delivery of the portion of the GSK contract that the company still believes it can fill.

"A new delivery schedule for the flu vaccine from GSK is still being determined but it is expected that deliveries will start in the second or third week of October, long before flu immunization demand reaches its peak," it said.

Bottles of flu vaccine make their way through a GlaxoSmithKline assembly line in Ste. Foy, Que., in this 2004 photo. The company that makes much of Canada's annual flu vaccine and has the country's pandemic flu vaccine contract has been issued a warning by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. JACQUES BOISSINOT/THE CANADIAN PRESS FILE

GSK said in an email that the production problem was unrelated to the concerns raised earlier this year in inspections by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and Health Canada.

The two-million-dose shortfall represents just under 17 per cent of Canada's total vaccine purchase for this year.

The news comes as provinces and territories are gearing up to start flu vaccination programs beginning next month.

Warning letter

FDA found a variety of problems

The FDA had issued a warning letter after it found a variety of problems in an inspection, stemming from bacterial contamination in the plant's water supply.

The company said it identified irregular results in its routine quality control monitoring on Aug. 14 and suspended production to investigate and try to fix the problem. Production was reinstated on Aug. 26 but it will result in a delivery delay, the company said.

It also said it had "an invalid test result" on one component of the vaccine, which protects against three different strains of influenza.

Canada leading push for 'flushable wipes' standard

Canada is leading an international work group to come up with an industry-wide standard for so-called flushable wipes as waste-water experts in North America and beyond blame the personal towelettes for a host of sewage system problems.

Barry Orr, a waste-water official in London, Ont., is among the Canadians leading the Geneva-based International Standards Organization's efforts to develop the standard.

Raw numbers

20,000

Last month, officials in the Minnesota town of Cambridge said they suspected personal wipes were the culprit after 20,000 gallons of raw sewage spilled into a river after a backup at a waste-water treatment facility.

Orr is currently developing tests that will determine the flushability of a barrage of products on the market that declare themselves sewer- and septic-safe.

"Canada is at the forefront in addressing the flushability of these products," Orr, who has been raising alarm bells about the products for years, said in a recent interview.

"We're leading the ISO, and we're working with nations across the globe to make improvements."

Flushable wipes are a multibillion-dollar business.

But from Louisiana to southwestern Ontario and rural England, plumbers and waste-water experts say the pre-moistened wipes, branded as a cleaner alternative to toilet paper, are taking a terrible toll on residential pipes and municipal sewage systems, causing major clogs and sewer backups. Comedian Joan Rivers dead at 81

Got her start at local clubs in New York.
In 1965, she landed her big break on The Tonight Show

Joan Rivers, the raucous, acid-tongued comedian who crashed the male-dominated realm of late-night talk shows and turned Hollywood red carpets into danger zones for badly dressed celebrities, died Thursday. She was 81.

Rivers was hospitalized last week after she went into cardiac arrest at a Manhattan doctor's office following a routine procedure. Daughter Melissa Rivers said she died at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York, surrounded by family and close friends.

"My mother's greatest joy in life was to make people laugh," Melissa Rivers said. "Although that is difficult to do right now, I know her final wish would be that we return to laughing soon."

Rivers, who made "Can we talk?" a trademark of her routines, never mellowed during her half-century-long career. She had insults ready for all races, genders and creeds. She moved from longtime targets such as the weight problems of Elizabeth Taylor, of whom she said "her favourite food is seconds," to newer foes such as Miley Cyrus, and continued to appear on stage and on TV as an octogenarian.

Comedy was not only her calling but her therapy, as she turned her life inside out for laughs, mocking everything from her proclaimed lack of sex appeal ("My best birth control now is just to leave the lights on") to her own mortality.

"I have never wanted to be a day less than I am," she insisted in a 2013 interview with The Associated Press. "People say, 'I wish I were 30 again.' Nahhh! I'm very happy HERE. It's great. It gets better and better. And then, of course, we die," she quipped.

Coffee plants mutated to have caffeine: Study

Scientists have woken up and smelled the coffee — and analyzed its DNA.

They found that what we love about coffee — the caffeine — is a genetic quirk, not related to the caffeine in chocolate or tea.

"It's an accident that has been frozen in place very likely by the influence of natural selection," says University of Buffalo evolutionary biologist Victor Albert. He and more than 60 other researchers from around the world mapped out the genetic instruction book of java. Their results were published Thursday in the journal Science.

Albert says researchers discovered that caffeine developed separately in coffee, tea and chocolate.

Pop-up message

Facebook asks users to review privacy settings

Facebook is being more proactive in ensuring its users fully understand their privacy settings and who can see their posts.

On Thursday, the social-media giant began pushing out a pop-up message asking that users spend "a minute or two" reviewing their privacy settings to confirm everything is set up right.

Facebook, which has more than 19 million users in Canada, will first target users who log in with a desktop or laptop computer.

"We're trying to listen closely to user feedback and help people make sure they're sharing with who they want," said Facebook product manager Paddy Underwood.

Father of Georgia toddler charged with murder

More than two months after his son's death in a hot car, a Georgia man — who prosecutors say sat in his office exchanging nude photos with women while his son languished for hours — was charged with murder on Thursday.

A Cobb County grand jury indicted Justin Ross Harris on multiple charges, including malice murder, felony murder and cruelty to children. The malice murder charge indicates that prosecutors intend to prove Harris intentionally left his son Cooper in the hot car to die.

Harris will be arraigned in the next few weeks, and Cobb County District Attorney Vic Reynolds said he will decide before then whether to seek the death penalty.

Harris has been in jail since his arrest the day his 22-month-old son died.

Harris has told police he was supposed to drive his son to daycare the morning of June 18 but drove to work without realizing that the child was strapped into a car seat in the back.

Police have said the toddler was left in the vehicle for about seven hours. The medical examiner's office has said the boy died of hyperthermia — essentially overheating — and has called his death a homicide.

Prosecutors have questioned Harris' wife, Leanna, and she has hired a criminal defence attorney, but no charges have been filed against her. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Wedding bus swept away, bride and groom missing

Worst floods in 22 years. Many Kashmir ceremonies postponed as heavy rains disrupt wedding season

A bus carrying more than 50 wedding guests was swept away Thursday by a flooded stream in the Indian-controlled portion of Kashmir, and all but three of the passengers were missing, officials said. Police officer Rajesh Kumar said the three swam to safety and told rescuers that about 50 others were trapped in the bus.

Rescuers were searching for the bus but had not been able to locate it in the gushing waters. New landslides and heavy rains blocked access to the area, Kumar said.

The Press Trust of India news agency said the bride and bridegroom were among the missing people who were returning home from a wedding ceremony in a village about 180 kilometres southwest of Srinagar.

At least 18 people have died in the past two days, and authorities on Thursday closed schools and stopped train services in the Kashmir valley. Police officer Imtiyaz Hussain said the 18 victims were swept away by floodwaters or buried by mud.

‘Womenomics’ plan means even Japan’s PM has to do dishes

Akie Abe. Prime minister’s wife says women work harder than men but are not represented fairly

Japan’s first lady says she has such a busy schedule that sometimes it’s up to the prime minister to do the dishes or take out the garbage.

Despite her husband’s conservative image, she says he does chores when he can. It’s the kind of flexibility that she says is needed for advancement of women in Japan.

Prime Minister Shinzo Abe is pushing companies and the government to hire and promote more women. He appointed five women to his 18-member cabinet on Wednesday.

His wife, Akie Abe, 52, said Thursday she is involved in a wide range of activities that keep her out all day, leaving her little time for house chores.

Even though she openly refers to herself as a member of the “opposition in the household” on some issues her husband favours, such as nuclear energy, she is a big supporter of his policy of promoting women’s advancement, which has been dubbed “womenomics.”

Akie Abe says it’s important that society allows women enough flexibility to work again after child-rearing or other life events that often interrupt their professional careers, she said.

In Japan, even highly educated women are underrepresented in senior-level positions in companies, government and universities. Women have long been discriminated against in salary and promotion in corporate Japan and often faced obstacles to pursuing their careers due to lack of help in child care and helpful spouses.

Survivors' blood may be key to developing new Ebola therapy

Outbreak. Unproven therapy would use antibodies from survivors to combat the often-deadly virus

As West Africa struggles to contain the biggest Ebola outbreak ever, some experts say an unusual but simple treatment might help: the blood of survivors.

The evidence is mixed for using infection-fighting antibodies from survivors' blood for Ebola, but some say it's worth a shot considering there are so few licensed or tested drugs.

"This is something that's fairly simple to do," said Dr. Peter Piot, director of London's School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine and the co-discoverer of the Ebola virus.

Using survivors' blood is just one novel Ebola treatment under discussion at a two-day meeting that began Thursday in Geneva. Over 200 experts were assembled by the World Health Organization to look at issues of safety and effectiveness, while considering which treatments should be prioritized for testing. There are about a half-dozen medications and vaccines in development. None have been rigorously tested in humans, but testing of one vaccine began this week in the U.S.

In contrast to ZMapp, the largely untested drug used on seven Ebola patients — two of whom died — utilizing the blood of recovered patients doesn't welcome the same complications of administering treatments, given that the drug's developer has said it will take months to make even a modest supply.

Some scientists think antibodies in the blood of Ebola survivors could help patients infected with the deadly disease. Piot said it is vital to find out if the blood treatment is effective.

"I hope this is the last Ebola outbreak where all we have is isolation, quarantine and supportive care to treat patients," he said.

Therapy a unique opportunity

Dr. Colin Brown, who recently worked in an Ebola clinic in Sierra Leone, said local hospitals should be able to provide survivors' blood if it's needed.

"It does give us the opportunity to try some new therapies," Brown said. "As long as they are not harmful, why shouldn't we try to do something?"

Canadians = conservationists?

A poll commissioned by Greenpeace suggests a clear majority of people in 30 countries want to see stronger efforts made to preserve the Arctic environment from industry expansion.

The four-question poll of over 30,000 people found some of the strongest support for conservation comes from Canada.

"(Canadians) definitely have higher numbers in each category when compared to the global average," said Farrah Khan, Greenpeace's Arctic campaigner, on Wednesday. "Canada's pretty high on the list."

RIWI Corp. did not supply a margin of error with the poll. Industry associations limit statements about margins of sampling error for most online surveys.

They found that 75 per cent of Canadians feel the Arctic Ocean should be free from oil drilling, while 70 per cent of Canadians want oil drilling and industrial-scale fishing kept out of international waters. Seventy-eight per cent of Canadians feel a wildlife sanctuary should be built in the North Pole. Energy companies found some support, with 47 per cent believing industry is capable of cleaning up a major spill.

Khan acknowledges the uphill battle in fighting for Arctic protection when so many governments are trying to expand into the north, but he said there's a disconnect between what's happening in the Canadian Arctic, for example, and what Canadians want.

"The will of the people in Canada and in many parts of the world is that we shouldn't be drilling," said Khan.

Ex-first lady depicts French president as cruel, dishonest

New book published. Valerie Trierweiler says François Hollande, with the Socialist Party, 'doesn't like the poor'

Ah, beware the writings of a betrayed woman.

Valerie Trierweiler, France's first lady until earlier this year, paints a harsh portrait of her former partner, the deeply unpopular President François Hollande, in her new book.

Being described as a mean liar who perpetuates a "cycle of infidelity" and doesn't like the poor surely can't help the image of the Socialist leader.

The couple broke up in January amid reports Hollande was having an affair with French actress Julie Gayet, which he did not deny.

In her 320-page book published Thursday, titled Thank You for this Moment, Trierweiler describes her relationship with Hollande in biting detail, from their first kiss to their breakup after the Gayet affair emerged.

Hollande's office declined to comment.

According to Trierweiler, the relationship was born of infidelity and died from it.

They almost tied the knot: Trierweiler wrote that he proposed in September 2012 and they planned a private wedding just before Christmas.

Hypocritical?

Somewhat unexpectedly for a politician who quipped about his dislike of the rich, Hollande "doesn't like the poor," writes Trierweiler.

- Royal defended Hollande Thursday, telling BFM-TV that he was an ardent defender of the poor while he was a regional governor.

With about a month to go, Hollande abruptly called off those plans, she wrote.

"Julie Gayet was already in his life, but I didn't know," wrote Trierweiler, a longtime journalist with Paris Match magazine.

When Trierweiler fell in love with Hollande, the mother of three was married, and he was the longtime partner of Segolene Royal, also a Socialist politician, and father of their four children. Hollande and Royal split in 2007, two years after his affair with Trierweiler began. Trierweiler lamented that she has been seen by many as the destroyer of the "mythic couple" of French politics.

Trierweiler wrote that she discovered his tryst with Gayet just days before gossip magazine Closer published photos of him reportedly going to a secret rendezvous with the actress.

CRTC report

Less channel surfing, more TV watching

Canadians spent a little less time channel surfing last year but still watched more TV content overall when accounting for streaming, suggests a report by the CRTC.

The average Canadian aged two or older watched 27.9 hours of TV a week in 2013 — or about four hours nightly — which was down by about 20 minutes from 2012, according to the 2014 Communications Monitoring Report. The average adult streamed 1.9 hours of TV content in 2013, which was up about 45 per cent over the previous year.

Over 40 per cent of Canadians said they watched TV over the Internet in 2013.

While many chose to cut the cord in 2013 and go without a TV subscription, they still made up a small minority.

Google to refund $19M for purchases made by children

Google has agreed to pay full refunds totalling at least $19 million to consumers who were charged for purchases that children made via apps without parental consent from the Google Play app store.

The settlement is part of the third case by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) about unauthorized in-app purchases made by children.

The FTC settled with Apple for $32.5 million in January and it has filed a complaint against Amazon.

In Google's case, the FTC said that since 2011, consumers have reported children making unauthorized purchases ranging from 99 cents to $200 within kids' apps downloaded from the Google Play store. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NATO urged to tackle ISIS threat

Summit. Britain and the U.S. are counting on the alliance to step up against the al-Qaida splinter group wreaking havoc in the Middle East

A meeting of NATO leaders convened in Britain Thursday facing no shortage of crises and a challenge from two of its dominant partners to confront a virulent new form of Islamic extremism in the Middle East.

Both U.S. President Barack Obama and British Prime Minister David Cameron called on the 28-member military alliance to deal with the emerging threat posed by the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS), an al-Qaida splinter group.

"We meet here at a solemn moment for our alliance and the security of our nations," Cameron said at the opening of the summit, being held on a rolling golf resort in the seaside Welsh community of Newport.

"We meet at a crucial time in the history of our alliance. The world faces many dangerous and evolving threats and it is absolutely clear that NATO is as vital to our future as it has been in our past."

Even the brush-fire war in eastern Ukraine and a resurgent Russia seemed to be eclipsed by the growing concern over ISIS, whose ranks of hardened fighters have been bolstered by hundreds of westerners from Britain, Canada and the United States.

The urgency is propelled by horrific Internet images of beheaded journalists and reports of atrocities in Syria and northern Iraq, as well as the fear that foreign fighters could return home to continue their war in the West.

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry convened a meeting of possible coalition partners, who could participate in an expanded bombing campaign and humanitarian relief.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who is also attending the summit, made it clear Wednesday, speaking to a British business audience, that Canada is prepared to do more as part of the international effort.

The Canadian air force is currently using two cargo planes to fly arms and ammunition into Iraq.

Sides aim for truce in Ukraine

Ukraine's government and rebels voiced hope Thursday that they were within reach of a peace deal that could spell a quick end to bloodshed in eastern Ukraine, even as NATO leaders and Ukraine's president agreed that Russia should be punished for its role in the insurgency.

Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko said he was ready to order a ceasefire in eastern Ukraine if a deal is signed at scheduled talks Friday in Minsk, Belarus. The rebels said they were ready to declare a truce if an agreement can be reached on a political settlement for the mostly Russian-speaking region.

Before flying to Wales for his meetings Thursday with NATO leaders, Poroshenko discussed the outlines of a peace deal with Russian President Vladimir Putin, and both voiced optimism about reaching agreement.

Specifics of the hoped-for peace deal have yet to be finalized. Putin has suggested that rebels halt their offensive while the Ukrainian government forces should pull back away from shelling residential areas.

By the numbers

The battles have taken a heavy toll on Ukraine's army. National Security Council spokesman Col. Andriy Lysenko said 837 Ukrainian servicemen have been killed and 3,044 wounded since the fighting began.

Poroshenko, in turn, has called for the withdrawal of foreign troops, a diplomatic reference to Russian forces, as well as establishing a buffer zone on the border and releasing all Ukrainian prisoners held in Russia.

Since mid-April, Moscow-backed separatists have been fighting government troops in eastern Ukraine in a conflict the UN estimates has killed nearly 2,600 people. On Thursday, a NATO military officer told The Associated Press the ranks of Russian soldiers directly involved in the conflict have grown.

Kremlin officials repeatedly have denied their troops or military assets are involved.

Iraq. Kurds tell Baird they need heavy weapons

Canada and allies France, Italy, Britain and Australia are, at the request of the Iraqis and Americans, helping to airlift guns, mortars and ammunition to Iraqi forces and the Kurdish Peshmerga, who have shouldered the bulk of the ground fighting against the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird visited a front-line Peshmerga post in Irbil, Iraq, on Thursday, with NDP and Liberal parliamentary critics Paul Dewar and Marc Garneau.

A senior Kurdish official made an urgent plea Thursday for heavy weaponry to fight the rampaging terrorist insurgency.

"We need more weapons.... It will be a long fight," said Faud Hussein, chief of staff to the president of the Kurdish Regional government.

But Baird politely deflected all talk of bolstering arms shipments to the Kurds, choosing instead to change the channel to his stated purpose for this trip — to encourage the development of a strong, new, inclusive central government in Baghdad. THE CANADIAN PRESS

U.S. fears Syrian weapons will end up in wrong hands

The United States is concerned that the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) and other terrorists could get a hold of chemical weapons if Syria is hiding any stockpiles, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations said Thursday.

Samantha Power spoke to reporters after the Security Council received a briefing from Sigrid Kaag, who heads the effort to rid Syria of its chemical weapons.

The joint mission of the UN and the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons will end at the end of the month after destroying nearly all of Syria's declared stockpile. But Kaag said there are discrepancies in Syria's weapons declaration. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Tomorrow's leaders look ahead to the New Canada

Charlottetown.
A selected few come together to discuss crucial areas in Canada's development over the next five decades

STEPHANIE ORFORD
For Metro

What will Canada become in the next 50 years? The New Canada Conference, held from Aug. 31 to Sept. 3, brought together delegates aged 19 to 24 from across Canada to answer that question.

One hundred delegates from across the country were chosen to attend the conference in Charlottetown, as part of P.E.I. 2014.

During the event, delegates broke into eight concentrations, each discussing a critical area in Canada's development over the next 50 years. At the end of the conference they gathered again and presented their ideas — all summarized in a conference Ideabook.

"My eyes were opened to so many things I never thought of," said Caitlin Taylor, a travel blogger with Saskatchewanderer, who collaborated as part of the Media and Technology group. "I learned so much and I want to share that."

Joseph Darcel, a sciences student at the University of Manitoba who worked in the Health and Wellness stream, called his peers at the conference "a very accomplished group."

"(The conference) was a chance for me to interface with people who didn't share my background," said Darcel. "It provided a helpful and informative way to engage in that dialogue and learn about different ways of being Canadian."

Civic Engagement and Social Cohesion Facilitator: Dave Meslind

How can we create a culture of participation in Canada?

"In order for democracy to work properly, we need to focus on enhancing social cohesion, focusing on social determinants of health and community engagement," said Olivia Dorey, a Nova Scotian studying public health and administration at the University of Ottawa who participated in the Civic Engagement and Social Cohesion discussion group.

Delegates discussed solutions like alternative voting systems and democracy in schools.

The goal? "Build a society in which our democracy can flourish," Dorey said.

Health and Well-being Facilitator: Ryan Meili

Factors such as income, education, housing and nutrition have been found to be the strongest determinants of the health and well-being of the Canadian population — so how can Canada develop a system to address these?

Delegates focused on how to target the causes of poor health and well-being, discussing issues such as "how Canada can work with aboriginal peoples to move into the future equitably," according to Darcel.

Delegates take part in the New Canada Conference in Charlottetown this week. COURTESY DAVID PIKE

Learning and Social Development Facilitator: Paul Kershaw

The group focused on ideas to strengthen the learning and social development of Canada's children.

"For me, our group's across-the-board recognition of the need for culturally aware, accessible and inclusive social services was most impactful," said Trent Warner, a public relations student at Mount Royal University in Calgary who participated in the Learning and Social Development group.

"We were all able to recognize the intersectional links between those people in our country who are marginalized and oppressed, and the inherent hindrances in the social system that erase diversity and personal identity."

Justice and Equity Facilitator: Josh Paterson

Canada's relationship with its First Nations and the country's treatment of newcomers are two of the most fraught issues in the country's history.

"Canada has a deeply problematic history in regards to indigenous rights, and the very sad reality is that these issues still persist," said Nisha Patel, a bachelor of commerce candidate at the University of Alberta and part of the Justice and Equity working group.

"Although I'm troubled by this, I was moved by how passionate my peers were, and I'm confident that we can change whatever we want."

Arts and Creativity Facilitator: Melissa Mongiat

As Canada's urban populations grow, culture, creativity and inclusivity are becoming critical in helping citizens connect and create healthy cities.

"What resonated with me the most was how we treat our indigenous people and cultures. I do a lot of work in the Innu communities in Labrador and consider myself pretty involved in the community, but there's still so much to learn," said Jamie Brace, a professional clown and performer from Kilbride in Newfoundland and Labrador.

Environment and Economy Facilitator: Jesika Briones

Countries around the world, including Canada, are going through an energy transition, said Jesika Briones, a business development manager for the Advanced Energy Centre in Toronto.

The world's population is growing explosively, availability of non-renewable energy resources is declining, and extraction and exploitation of these resources impacts the environment.

How can Canada and all of its stakeholders work to balance these factors and create a new energy economy?

Delegates looked at potential routes Canada could take in the next 50 years, including the use carbon taxes and the development of a national energy strategy.

Technology and Media Facilitator: Stephanie McGrath

Where is technology going and how can Canada stay ahead of the curve?

As content — video, text, photos and beyond — becomes available in even more formats and places than it is now, "we need to find a way to navigate the Internet," said Saskatchewanderer blogger Taylor.

One of the biggest challenges will be to create "better media literacy in schools, teaching kids from a young age to think critically about media," Taylor said.

Canada and the World Facilitator: Stéfanie von Hlatky

Current conflicts in Iraq, Syria and Ukraine indicate that our traditional approaches to diplomacy and defence aren't enough, said Stéfanie von Hlatky, director of the Centre for International and Defence Policy (CIDP) at Queen's University.

"As Canadians, we need to ask ourselves what we're willing to fight for in this volatile global security environment," said von Hlatky. "I think we've lost sight of that with the war fatigue that followed the mission in Afghanistan."

Delegates discussed alternative scenarios for Canadian involvement in international crises.

ISIS. Silicon Valley firms fight spread of grisly video after second beheading

Silicon Valley firms were prepared this week to quickly block video of an Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) militant beheading an American journalist, after a previous video by the same group showing the death of James Foley ricocheted through social networks in what was seen by some as a propaganda coup for the extremists.

The video that spread Tuesday showing the beheading of American journalist Steven Sotloff was first uploaded onto a different website and quickly deleted when copied onto YouTube, slowing the spread of posts linking to it, said a Silicon Valley insider, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic.

Facebook, Twitter, YouTube and others all have policies banning images of gratuitous violence or images that incite hatred. But grisly images, once viral, are hard to restrain.

As Tuesday's beheading video of Sotloff was launched so soon after Foley's death, "platforms were better prepared for it this time around," the insider said. Social-media firms are trying to force out ISIS "platform by platform." THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The fight to supersize McJob wages rages on

Can I get a raise with that? The movement continues to pressure fast-food giants into increasing employee wages to $15 an hour

Police handcuffed several protesters in New York and Detroit on Thursday, as they blocked traffic in the latest attempt to escalate their efforts to get McDonald's, Burger King and other fast-food companies to pay their employees at least $15 US an hour.

The protests, which are planned by labour organizers for about 150 cities nationwide throughout Thursday, are part of the Fight for $15 campaign. Since the protests began in late 2012, organizers have switched up their tactics every few months.

Before Thursday's protests, organizers said they planned to engage in nonviolent civil disobedience to draw more attention to the cause. In the past, supporters have showed up at a McDonald's shareholder meeting and held strikes.

Current minimum wage

Many U.S. fast-food workers do not make much more than the federal minimum wage of $7.25 US an hour, which adds up to about $15,000 a year for 40 hours a week.

The idea of civil disobedience arose in July when 1,300 workers held a convention in Chicago.

The movement, which is backed financially by the Service Employees International Union and others, has gained national attention at a time when the wage gap between the poor and the rich has become a hot political issue. Many fast-food workers do not make much more than the federal minimum wage of $7.25 an hour. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Dreadnoughtus ("fearing nothing")

Massive dino from Argentina should help reveal secrets of ancient behemoths

Researchers studying the remains of an enormous dinosaur — a creature that was bigger than seven bull elephants — have given it an equally colossal name: Dreadnoughtus, or "fearing nothing."

Scientists hope its unusually well-preserved bones will help reveal secrets about some of the largest animals ever to walk the Earth. The four-legged beast, with a long neck and powerful 8.8-metre tail, stretched about 25.9 metres long and weighed about 65 tonnes. That's more than seven times the weight of even a plus-size male African elephant.

Kenneth Lacovara of Drexel University in Philadelphia, who found the specimen in Argentina's southern Patagonia in 2005, said he can't claim it is the most massive dinosaur known because the remains of comparably sized beasts are too fragmentary to allow a direct comparison.

But it's the heaviest land animal whose weight during life can be calculated directly with a standard technique that analyzes bones of the upper limbs, he said. And its bones indicate it was still growing when it died.

Among the questions it can help scientists investigate, said Jeff Wilson of the University of Michigan, is what kind of anatomical features were needed to let a dinosaur grow so huge. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Attack of the angry ram

ANDREW FIFIELD
andrew.fifield@metronews.ca

Angry Ram made his public debut about a year ago when our drone-pilot pal had a very hostile encounter with him while dirt-biking in New Zealand. This touched off a beautiful friendship that continues to this day. Well, at least until two days ago, when Angry Ram was introduced to a quadcopter. I love Angry Ram. (YouTube/Buddhanz1)

‘No bad Bill Murray movies’

Reel Guys

RICHARD CROUSE AND MARK BRESLIN

Bill Murray in his latest film, St. Vincent. Sept. 5 is Bill Murray Day at TIFF, with free screenings planned for some of his most iconic films, including Groundhog Day, Stripes and, of course, Ghostbusters. CONTRIBUTED

Synopsis

On Sept. 5, the Reel Guys will be wearing our matching glow-in-the-dark Dr. Venkman khaki T-shirts to celebrate TIFF’s Bill Murray Day. Beginning at 10 a.m., the TIFF Bell Lightbox in Toronto will feature free screenings of Stripes, Groundhog Day and, everybody’s favourite, Ghostbusters, in advance of the world premier of Murray’s new movie St. Vincent. “I’m a nut,” Murray says, “but not just a nut.” His movies, which range from nutty comedies to dramas and everything in between, show his range. Today, as we celebrate the genius that is Bill Murray, the Reel Guys select a few must-sees.

Bill Murray Day. Think you’re a big Bill Murray fan? Check out these lesser-known films and roles for a glimpse into the depth of his talent

Richard: Mark, I feel happy just knowing that I live in the same world as Bill Murray. I’ve never met him, but his very existence and the existence of films like Meatballs, Ghostbusters, Lost in Translation and any of his movies with Wes Anderson make my world a better place.

If I had to choose one little-seen Murray movie to tout, it would be Where the Buffalo Roam — his take on the life of the high priest of Gonzo journalism, Hunter S. Thompson. It’s not a great film, but it’s worth it to hear Murray say the famous line, “I hate to advocate drugs or liquor, violence, insanity to anyone, but, in my case, it worked.”

Mark: Richard, here’s my pick for a little-known film starring Murray: The Razor’s Edge. At the height of Murray’s first round of fame, he managed to miscast himself in a Somerset Maugham costume drama about a man’s search for spirituality.

His acting style is completely at odds with the rest of the material, as he’s playing the part as a louche 19th-century wiseass. And you know what? I love it!

Also from this time period, the mid-’80s, is the underrated Scrooged, a great retelling of A Christmas Carol. Traditionalists who fondly remember Alistair Sims would be aghast, but Murray really knows how to shake off the cobwebs and make the movie funny and oddly touching.

RC: Have you seen Murray in Hyde Park on Hudson? He plays Franklin D. Roosevelt and he gives the kind of effortless performance that made me wonder what might have happened to his career if The Razor’s Edge hadn’t been such a flop, forcing him back into comedy. But he can switch back and forth easily.

The same year he played an undertaker in Get Low, he also played an exaggerated version of himself as a man who plays at being a zombie during the apocalypse so he can continue playing golf unbothered by the undead in Zombieland.

It’s a surreal cameo that, like most of Murray’s appearances, is worth the price of admission.

MB: There may be bad movies that Bill Murray is in but there are no bad Bill Murray movies. He consistently rises above the material. But when the script is top-notch, there is no beating him.

I’m thinking here of Groundhog Day — one of the best and smartest comedies of the past 30 years.

He takes a clever idea and turns it into something transcendent, even philosophical. Great movie, great performance.

RC: In the transcendent and philosophical pile, I’d throw in Broken Flowers, where Murray plays a man on a journey to reconnect with all the women he knew before he became a burned-out Don Juan.

Ebert gave this four out of four stars; I give it five out of four. It’s that good.

MB: Yes, a great role for him. But consider this: his supporting role in Tootsie, where he nearly steals scenes from the great Dustin Hoffman.

STREET FEST

NOW PLAYING ON BROADWAY

MANYFEST IS THE PLACE TO BE SEEN THIS WEEKEND

CONTRIBUTED

The Downtown Winnipeg Biz has done it again. For two full days and two glorious nights, Manitoba Liquor & Lotteries' Manyfest, Broadway's biggest street festival, is the place to be and be seen Friday to Sunday.

If you have never visited Broadway during summer season lunch hours, you simply must take in the ambience recreated for this phenomenal event. Imagine 25 scrumptious choices of freshly-prepared cuisine under blue skies and starry nights on Broadway.

Festival-goers will witness unique-to-the-Peg Food Truck Wars, which features 25 of Winnipeg's best mobile dining establishments. Tempt your taste buds with fantastic delicacies ranging from wood-fired pizza to fresh walleye. And that's not all — there is live music and much more.

After you have satisfied your cravings, you can cast your vote for the people's choice award. Last years' judges chose Vilai's Spice Box for best presentation, Pimp My Rice for best bang for your buck, and On a Roll Sandwich for most original. Food Truck Wars is proudly sponsored by Sky City Centre.

Once you have voted for your favourite foodies, you won't want to miss the wine and beer garden. Sample wonderful Cabernets, glorious Chardonnays and an array of cold beverages in support of Keeping Abreast. This event offers free entrance with tasting tickets for purchase on-site.

With vehicle traffic closed to the area, festival-goers are free to walk the venues safely while they play. There are also many places for you to park your ride, and organizers encourage the use of alternative forms of transportation. For those arriving on bike or using strollers, visit the free Winnipeg bicycle valet in Memorial Park. Many of the area's lots are also offering complementary parking. Look for "event parking" signs or visit Winnipeg Transit for route information.

For more information on parking and the multitude of events, visit manyfest.ca.

Experience the pulse of downtown

CONTRIBUTED

Join downtown's biggest street party of the year as the Downtown Winnipeg Biz brings you the Manitoba Liquor & Lotteries Manyfest, which celebrates the diversity and ambience of Winnipeg.

Along with 50,000 attendees, experience the sights and sounds as the pulse of Broadway is alive and vibrant from Friday to Sunday.

Live music is presented throughout Saturday and Sunday, so feel free to jive to the beat on the street with great performances from top local acts for free. Big Dance on Broadway is proudly sponsored by Winnipeg Arts Council.

In honour of late actor Robin Williams, bring your blankets at sundown on Friday to watch Jumanji on the giant outdoor screen courtesy of the WCB. Donations will also be accepted for the Mood Disorders Association of Manitoba.

Ciclovia, meaning "bike way," first began in Bogotá, Colombia, where every Sunday major roads are closed to traffic. Millions of people fill the streets, running, biking and walking while enjoying free outdoor fitness classes. Interestingly, Winnipeg is one of the first Canadian cities to host a Ciclovia event. On Sunday, join hundreds of attendees for a walk, jog, or cycle from Assiniboine Park to the Forks on a car-free route. There will be fabulous music, a bike zone, soap box derby, cycle-cross demos, and much more.

The Downtown Winnipeg Biz is also thrilled to offer attendees a chance to take in another of Winnipeg's first-ever events — a living soccer pitch. FIFA Women's World Cup Canada 2015 organizers have gathered hundreds of volunteers to form a living soccer pitch for an exciting soccer match between local celebs and Winnipeg's mayoral candidates on Saturday.

For more information on these events and more, visit manyfest.ca today.

Diving into another Dolphin Tale

Sequel. Teen stars Nathan Gamble and Cozi Zuehlsdorff reunite for another silver screen splash

RICHARD CROUSE
scene@metronews.ca

"All I did was teach you not to cover her blowhole," he says.

"I wouldn't have known that," she laughs.

No, that's not the punchline to a bad joke, it's part of the easy banter between Dolphin Tale 2's teen stars Nathan Gamble and Cozi Zuehlsdorff.

They were preteens when they first worked together on Dolphin Tale, the story of Winter, an injured dolphin rescued by the Clearwater Marine Hospital and fitted with a prosthetic tail. "My character didn't really get to go underwater in the first one," says Cozi, "so it was all, almost, a new experience. Winter and Nathan were the veterans and they taught me and Hope (the second movie's dolphin star) the ropes."

Like not covering the blowhole.

Dolphin Tale 2 is a continuation of Winter's tale. This time around Sawyer and Hazel and the Clearwater Marine Hospital folks search for a companion for the lonely dolphin. "Think about it," says Nathan, "has there ever been a sequel to a true story? And one that is also true? It's pretty rare."

The second movie's story was inspired by a true event that happened during the wrap party for the first film.

"That's when we got the call that Hope was rescued," says Nathan. "We were there and so it feels like we were a little bit part of the story."

"The truck pulled up and Hope was really carried by hand up to the pool," says Cozi, "and really lowered into the pool the way you see in the movie. It was incredible. (Dolphin Tale 2) is as true-to-life as you could get without saying it was a wrap party for a movie. That wouldn't have fit into the story."

Does Gump live up to our nostalgia-tinted memories?

Forrest Gump is being re-released in select IMAX theatres this weekend. CONTRIBUTED

MATT PRIGGE
Metro World News in New York

In 1994, the movies belonged to Forrest Gump. It was the year's highest-grossing film, narrowly besting The Lion King, and was at one point the fourth biggest moneymaker in film history. It took home six of the 11 Oscars for which it was nominated, including best picture and best actor — Tom Hanks' second consecutive win after Philadelphia. Its soundtrack, littered with recycled hits from the '60s and '70s, was a hit too, and the 1986 source novel, by Winston Groom, became a bestseller.

But 20 years is a long time, and one era's monster hit is another's "dated" (that awful word) embarrassment. Now that it's being rereleased in theatres, in a probably unnecessary IMAX redo, here are a few ways to look at Gump two decades down the line.

As the victim of a backlash

Anything that has the cultural impact Forrest Gump did will attract a backlash. The one it got came harsh and fast. By the time the Oscars rolled around in March of 1995, there were two kinds of Americans: those who embraced Gump, with its idyllic view of America during troubled times, and those who were crazy for Pulp Fiction, the darker, more original bad boy movie of the year. Quentin Tarantino's juggernaut wound up having a larger impact on movies and the zeitgeist, creating careers and wave upon wave of imitators.

Gump is still beloved; 14th place on the all-time list of popular movies by the Internet Movie Database users (ahead of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, behind Inception) is nothing to sneeze at. But ranking higher are two other 1994 titles: Pulp Fiction (No. 5) and The Shawshank Redemption (No. 1). Gump was a critic's hit upon release, too, but retrospective reviews have been less kind. Indeed, it's become a critical punching bag among the cognoscenti — the film one holds up as the populist hit that quickly turned mouldy and insufferable.

As a conservative beacon

In Groom's novel, Gump is a rougher character: He swears, he has sex and he even, briefly, becomes a folk singer along with BFF Jenny. Eric Roth's screenplay sands Gump down; he becomes the embodiment of all that is decent about America, who chooses to fight for his country while Jenny embraces hedonistic hippiedom and pays a price. The counterculture is depicted as evil; the SDS guy beats women and the Black Panthers are portrayed as scary black men. It's easy to read Gump as portraying that conservative canard about the failure of the hippies to impact the change they sought (though it skips the part where some of them turn into mega-capitalists in the '80s). For the record, Gump's producers claim it's apolitical, while its reliably liberal star likely disagrees with this reading as well.

As a bastardization of a novel

There are a lot of changes from Groom's novel, some already detailed. But the most dramatic is the physical change. In the book, Gump is six feet six inches 242 pounds; Groom imagined John Goodman for the role. Tom Hanks, meanwhile, is a lean six feet, and though his Gump plays football, just like his literary counterpart, it's because he can run, not because he can sack players. The book Gump is also an idiot savant, not just an idiot, who can read books (if not remember them well) and who becomes a chess champion. Among the many other unfilmed misadventures he gets into — which would make for a no doubt crazier movie — are him going to space with an ape named Sue, his four year imprisonment by cannibals and him becoming a stunt man and a pro wrestler. Then again, 142 minutes is already pretty long.

Once scorned by Hollywood's finest, the world of television has in recent years become increasingly attractive to filmmakers. Exemplifying the trend, these iconic directors have turned the small screen into their playing field.

AFP

5 Filmmakers in the TV game

Steven Soderbergh

Steven Soderbergh GETTY IMAGES

Last year, Soderbergh announced the end of his career as a feature film director. But the director, who won the top prize at Cannes in 1989 for his feature debut Sex, Lies, and Videotape, is actually more active than ever and has simply shifted his focus to TV. Since helming the TV movie Behind the Candelabra for HBO, which earned him the Emmy for best director in the category, Soderbergh has kept up the momentum with a number of TV projects. Besides producing and directing every episode in the first season of The Knick — the medical series premiered on Cinemax this summer and starring Clive Owen — Soderbergh is working on Red Oaks, a comedy ordered by Amazon Studios. He is also developing a TV adaptation of his feature The Girlfriend Experience, which he will produce for Starz.

Alejandro Gonzales Iñárritu

Alejandro Gonzales Iñárritu GETTY IMAGES

Thanks to his 2006 feature Babel, Iñárritu became the first Mexican director to be nominated for the Academy Award for best director and the first to claim the best director award at Cannes. These prestigious honours have not prevented him from taking a break from the silver screen for his next project, a new series titled One Percent. Set against the backdrop of the organic farming community, the black comedy is in the process of recruiting A-list actors Ed Helms (The Office, The Hangover), two-time Oscar-winner Hilary Swank and veteran actor Ed Harris. One Percent has not yet been picked up by a network, but its producers should have no trouble finding a taker.

Guillermo del Toro

Guillermo del Toro GETTY IMAGES

Known for his signature dark fantasy world, the Mexican filmmaker and novelist chose a familiar subject for his first major TV project, which is adapted from the vampire book trilogy he co-authored with Chuck Hogan. After directing two episodes of the series Hora Marcada early in his career and an episode of The Simpsons in 2013, Del Toro recently dove headlong into TV as an executive producer and sometime director on The Strain, which premiered on July 13. The thriller series is adapted from the trilogy's first book, which was published in 2009. The Fall and The Night Eternal followed in 2010 and 2011 respectively.

Steven Spielberg

Steven Spielberg AFP

Widely considered to be one of the most iconic filmmakers of his generation, Steven Spielberg actually got his start on the tube, and he hasn't forgotten it. His first big success was the TV movie Duel, which first aired in 1971 and went on to a theatrical release in 1973. Despite his significant achievements in cinema, the filmmaker has always remained active in the world of television, often as a director but namely as a producer. To name a few productions, Spielberg was behind the fantasy series Amazing Stories (from 1985), the sci-fi drama Terra Nova (2011) inspired by his blockbuster Jurassic Park, and the musical series Smash (2012), which was cancelled after just one season. In collaboration with Tom Hanks, he executive produced Band of Brothers (2007) and The Pacific (2010), HBO's two miniseries on the landings of American troops in France and the Pacific islands during the Second World War.

J.J. Abrams

J.J. Abrams GETTY IMAGES

Although he dreamed of making great movies like his idol Steven Spielberg, it was through the small screen that J.J. Abrams got his start in show business. He started to gain notoriety in 1998 as a creator on Felicity. In 2001, he founded his production company Bad Robot, through which he launched the hit show Alias, followed by the massively popular Lost and later Fringe in 2008. Meanwhile, he saw his filmmaking dreams come true, landing in the director's chair of Mission Impossible III to kick off his cinema career. He went on to helm Cloverfield, Super 8 and the first two Star Trek reboot movies, but the ultimate honours came with being selected to direct the seventh Star Wars movie.

Michael Cera takes New York City

No sleep till Brooklyn. Cera is wide-eyed with new projects since settling down in NYC

CINDY ORD/GETTY IMAGES

Brooklyn is currently awash with facial hair, hipsters and tons of kale — and now 100 per cent more Michael Cera.

The 26-year-old star of Juno and Superbad has relocated to the New York borough after several years in which he would visit the city and then feel sad when it was time to go home to Los Angeles.

"I always loved New York. I always wanted to live here since I was a kid," he says.

The move makes sense. If you think about it, Cera has always seemed like more of a New Yorker — intellectual, arty, low-key, slyly cynical — than the plastic pretty boys over on the other coast.

It also coincides with Cera exploring new artistic expressions — the release of an indie folk album and his Broadway debut, all this summer. "Yeah, it's a few things happening at once," he says, humbly and yet guarded.

The play he's chosen seems a comfortable fit with many of Cera's previous film roles. It's Kenneth Lonergan's This Is Our Youth, a portrait of adrift, privileged post-adolescents that co-stars Kieran Culkin and Tavi Gevinson.

Cera plays Warren, a nerdish rich kid who shows up at his friend Dennis's Manhattan apartment in 1982 with $15,000 he has stolen from his menacing father. They come up with a dangerous plan to not only return the money and avoid punishment, but also to party.

The script calls Warren "a strange barking-dog of a kid with large tracts of thoughtfulness in his personality" who is "just beginning to find beneath his natural eccentricity a dogged self-possession." In other words, not too much of a stretch.

To find himself on Broadway, Cera admits, is "pretty far-fetched," especially in a play that centres on the dialogue between disaffected, drug-addled young adults.

"I think it's fascinating that this has no bells and whistles, really," he says. "The value of the experience is this emotional arc and that, for a mainstream thing, I think that is significant."

Cera has also revealed his inner songwriter, quietly releasing an 18-song album on his Bandcamp website on Aug. 8. It's a collection of airy, folky tracks, some just wordless fragments, some more fully fleshed out.

"The music thing is not a particular ambition or something. It's just something I do at home," he says. "I didn't think that many people would find it or hear it because the Internet is such a sea, a blizzard of stuff."

The album, created using GarageBand software, is a part of technology that Cera can get behind. One he can't is obvious whenever he gets on a subway in his new home: camera phones. He says a lot of folks secretly take his picture.

"The world is just becoming this photo booth in a weird way," he says. "The only way to get used to it is to come to terms with it. You can't fight it."

Estranged rockers roar back to life

Death From Above 1979. Popular indie rock duo reunites for their first official album in nearly a decade, to the delight of ravenous fans

Time and space have been good for the inner workings of Death From Above 1979, but drummer/vocalist Sebastien Grainger has a different take on the situation.

"We don't need space to make this band work," he says. "We need proximity."

Death From Above released The Physical World, its first album in a decade — and only the second of its career — this past Tuesday, ending a long silence by one of Toronto's most revered post-millennial indie-rock acts.

Few observers were optimistic it would ever be broken when the duo blew apart in 2006. But the band roared back to life decisively this week, setting up a pop-up shop (and tattoo parlour) on Queen Street West that might be the site of the "small shows" Grainger recently predicted via Reddit.

Even when the bad vibes from the split had cleared and Grainger and bassist Jesse F. Keeler started speaking again for the first time in five years — en route to some high-profile reunion gigs at the SXSW, Coachella and Lollapalooza festivals in 2012 — the pair still viewed the prospect of a new record with suspicion.

It was something they wouldn't consider, says Grainger, "until we'd kind of proved to ourselves that we enjoyed it and that people were enjoying it."

The fact that a lot of people were thirsting for more DFA became clear when its return to the stage at Austin's Beauty Bar for SXSW in March 2012 provoked a riot amongst fans, who tore down the venue's back-alley fences to get into the performance.

Grainger and Keeler, however, fretted from the get-go that they didn't have any fresh material for the reunion and were conscious of prematurely becoming a nostalgia act, so they cautiously began testing new tunes on subsequent tours until the public reaction felt right.

"There's a certain goodwill that's extended toward reunion bands," says Grainger. "At a certain point, we didn't want to be a reunion band anymore."

"We're playing this music that is Seb-and-Jesse 'skill level' in 2003, when we actually recorded the record. And now, here we are with all these additional tools in our tool box — skill- and music- and concept-wise — and we're still playing these same things," says Keeler. "For me, we either had to stop playing again, because it was just like 'All right, that's the thing you were talking about years ago and now we've done it and we're done,' or we did this. It had to be a living thing for us to continue with it."

Both sides of the DFA partnership established themselves as individual talents during their time apart. Those outside pursuits have also made it much easier to work together again.

Both Keeler and Grainger are more comfortable in their own skins and to take the heavy moments on The Physical World to heavier places, while pursuing their pop inclinations to even poppier extremes.

3 songs for the weekend

Spooky sounds, Icelandic melodies and a quirky rocker

Coelacanth/ Teach Me Equals

Any band that can write a song about a once-thought-to-be-extinct prehistoric fish is OK by me. This is part of what they call "scrape rock" — whatever that is.

Tina/HEK

Pleasant indie folk-pop from an Icelandic singer-songwriter. And like everything from that country, there's the inevitable connection to Bjork. In this case, it's because the album was produced by her ex-husband.

Follow Me, Like Me/My Son the Bum

Long Beach, N.Y. band (motto: "No cut & paste rock here!") that really, really wants you to follow them on Twitter and like them on Facebook. They even wrote a song about it.

Video game review

Name. Professor Layton vs. Phoenix Wright

For. Nintendo 3DS

Rated. Teen

Apparently transported to medieval times, Layton and Phoenix must use their skills to defend a woman accused of witchcraft. You'll solve magic puzzles in one chapter and face an inquisition court in the next, with both franchises mixing together their styles and humour for an entertaining display of animated seething, weeping, pointing, and posturing. The puzzles are creative, if confusing at times, and the courtroom battles offer some neat twists, but I really like the subtle way the two heroes meet and try on each other's roles. No objection here. KRIS ABEL

OUR TAKE ON THE WORLD OF CELEBRITIES

Jennifer Lawrence. ALL PHOTOS GETTY IMAGES

Nude photos of Lawrence and other celebs added to artist's life-sized gallery

Wonder how Jennifer Lawrence's lawyers are going to deal with this one: Fear Google artist XVALA has announced the recent collection of leaked celebrity nude photos will be added to his upcoming No Delete gallery show in St. Petersburg, Fla. — printed out life-sized and unaltered on canvas.

"XVALA appropriating celebrity compromised images and the overall Fear Google campaign has helped strengthen the ongoing debate over privacy in the digital era," the artist's publicist, Cory Allen, says in a statement.

"The commentary behind this show is a reflection of who we are today. We all become 'users' and in the end, we become 'used.'"

And if we're famous enough, we become part of a public gallery show.

Rosie joins Rosie on View despite her 'annoying' voice

In case you thought one "Rosie joins the View" announcement wasn't enough? Rosie Perez has signed a deal to sit alongside Rosie O'Donnell and Whoopi Goldberg, reports Radar Online.

"Rosie was on the fence about doing it, but when news surfaced that ABC was looking elsewhere for A-list talent, like Ashley Judd, it spurred her decision," a source says. "Rosie has been in the mix, but no one thought it was going to happen. The testing on Rosie was that her voice was too annoying and she was too old. But they ended up going with her because they wanted someone famous and she appeals to the Latina demographic."

Mariah begins divorce process, Nick declares his undying love

NED EHRBAR
Metro in Hollywood

Mariah Carey and Nick Cannon appear to be approaching this whole breakup thing very differently. While Cannon is said to be eager for another chance, Carey seems to be ready to make the split official.

"Mariah has started the divorce process. She's getting all her ducks in a row," a source tells E! News. "She was devastated when he spoke out about their issues. She's started the proceedings to make sure the ball is in her court from now on."

Meanwhile, Cannon — who is reportedly banned from discussing the divorce publicly — has taken to tweeting about his marriage and his undying love for Carey.

"What infuriates me most is to hear people slander Mariah Carey. I will forever be indebted to her for blessing me with our children," he tweeted. "I will always love her unconditionally for this and so much more. Mariah Carey is an amazing mother and I trust her wholeheartedly."

He also has an interesting take on the gossip item that started the ball rolling: "And finally, 'trouble in paradise' is the dumbest phrase I've ever heard! I would never say that s—."

Deadmau5

Musician or cartoon? Disney wants to be clear

Deadmau5 is learning the hard way that Disney doesn't have much of a sense of humour, as the star DJ revealed the House of Mouse is taking legal action against him.

"Looks like Disney officially just filed in opposition of my trademark. Lawyer up, Mickey," deadmau5 tweeted this week. "Disney thinks you might confuse an established electronic musician/performer with a cartoon mouse. That's how stupid they think you are."

His lawyer, Dina LaPolt, explained it further: "In June of last year, deadmau5 applied to register the front-facing mau5head with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office. Disney is now opposing the U.S. filing," she explains. "Given that the mau5head and other identifying deadmau5 trademarks have been used in the U.S. and around the world for almost a decade, we wonder why Disney is only now coming after deadmau5."

Phone-hacking scandal 'an honour to put to film'

George Clooney knows what movie he's directing next. The Good Night and Good Luck director will next take on the British phone-hacking scandal by adapting Nick Davies' book, Hack Attack for the screen, his company announced.

"This has all the elements — lying, corruption, blackmail — at the highest levels of government by the biggest newspaper in London," Clooney says. "And the fact that it's true is the best part. Nick is a brave and stubborn reporter and we consider it an honour to put his book to film."

George Clooney

No word yet on whether Hugh Grant, who became a phone-hacking activist during the scandal, will have a part, but we're sure he wants one.

Stop! Don't reach for that boxed meal

Beef Noodles. Making your own version of this typically pre-packaged dish is easy and takes no time

Because everyone gets even busier in the fall, it's the perfect time to get organized and add some quick-and-easy meals to your roster of go-to recipes.

If you're used to reaching for boxed noodles in a culinary emergency, it's time to upgrade to the DIY version.

1. In a large pot of salted boiling water, cook the noodles al dente. Drain and drizzle with a little olive oil to prevent them from sticking together. Set aside.

2. In a large non-stick skillet over medium heat, cook the onion in the butter, stirring with a wooden spoon until golden brown. Add the meat and garlic. Continue cooking over high heat, crumbling the meat into small pieces with a spoon, until lightly browned. Season with salt and pepper. Sprinkle the flour and chili powder over the meat and stir to blend.

This recipe serves four. COURTESY RICARDOCUISINE.COM

Ingredients

- 1/2 lb (227 g) broad egg noodles (twisted)
- Olive oil
- 1 onion, finely chopped
- 2 tsp (30 ml) butter
- 1 lb (454 g) lean ground beef
- 1 clove garlic, finely chopped or crushed with a garlic press
- Salt and pepper
- 1 tsp (5 ml) all-purpose flour
- 1 tsp (5 ml) chili powder
- 1 cup (250 ml) chicken broth
- 1 tbsp (15 ml) soy sauce
- 1 tsp (5 ml) Worcestershire sauce
- 2 cups (500 ml) grated yellow cheddar cheese

FLASH FOOD

From your fridge to your table in 30 minutes or less

3. Add the broth, soy sauce, Worcestershire sauce and cheese. Stir until the cheese has melted. Add the noodles and toss to coat with the sauce. Remove the saucepan from the heat and let rest for 5 to 10 minutes. The sauce will thicken slightly. Adjust the seasoning.

Satisfy your sweet tooth

If you thought the popularity of sweeter red wines was starting to decline, drink again.

Demand for red juice with a touch (and in some cases a fistful) of sugar has never been stronger.

While snobs may turn up their noses, the growing selection of wines with a confectionary slant is appealing to new consumers who would traditionally fill their glasses with beer or a cocktail.

One of the latest countries trying to satisfy the market's sweet tooth is South Africa. Though it's made casual sipping reds with the pinotage grape for years, the 2011 Inception Deep Layered Red ($13.49 - $15.99) is a juicy shiraz-based blend.

Launched here in Canada before anywhere else, its sugary side — enhanced with a nice balance of ripe blueberry, blackberry and cherry fruit — isn't syrupy or cloying.

It's a party pleaser, especially if you're hosting a late summer barbecue.

Its flavour will get your guests' tongues wagging, as should its provocative Garden of Eden label design. PRICES REFLECT THE RANGE ACROSS THE COUNTRY. SOME PRODUCTS MAY NOT BE AVAILABLE IN ALL PROVINCES.

Enjoy lobster claws for a good cause

Le Cercle Molière is hosting 38th annual Lobster Gala Sept. 20

Although Winnipeg sits in the midst of the Prairies and hosts many beautiful waterways with local delicacies, residents really enjoy crustaceans, especially those harvested from the waters of Atlantic Canada.

Six-thousand pounds of all-you-can eat, fresh, succulent lobster served both hot and cold from Cap-Pelé, N.B., is on the menu at the 38th edition of Le Cercle Molière's unique to Winnipeg fundraising event, the Lobster Gala.

The 89-year-old company is hosting this spectacular event Sept. 20 at 6 p.m. in the RBC Convention Centre Winnipeg.

Since 1977, the Lobster Gala is Le Cercle Molière's major annual fundraising event and provides much-needed funds for diverse programming that offers youth programs, four main stage shows, a youth theatre festival, and much more.

The gala is unique for its sophisticated, yet laid-back environment, allowing lobster lovers to cut loose and have fun while supporting this wonderful cause. Geneviève Pelletier, Le Cercle Molière's artistic director, is thrilled at the success of this unique event.

CONTRIBUTED

"All-you-can-eat lobster, signature martinis, incredible prizes, an evening of dancing to the sounds of Ego Spank featuring Winnipeg's finest musicians — this is an event you'll absolutely want to partake in," she says.

After the feast, guests can partake in silent and rainbow auctions with grand prizes that have guests talking for days. This year's ultimate grand prize is a first-class trip aboard Via Rail Canada's luxury car to majestic Jasper, Alta., with three nights stay at the picturesque Whistler Inn.

And to top it all off, after an evening of dancing to talented local musicians, you will surely feel great about supporting such a wonderful cause.

As a special end-of-summer gift to our readers, Metro brings you the first chapter of The Afterlife of Stars, the newest book by award-winning author Joseph Kertes. Over the last week we've introduced you to the Beck brothers, two young boys grappling with the world around them as Russian tanks roll into Budapest during the final days of the Hungarian revolution. In this final instalment, Attila and Robert get a glimpse of the dangers that are around every street corner as their world is turned upside down.

The Afterlife of Stars

Will this be the last time the Beck brothers see their city? CONTRIBUTED

I felt a little strange, but I could hardly wait to see the square again. It had been some time since I'd been there. I had come with my class on a clear day last spring. Stalin had stood like a Titan in the square on a high stone pedestal, a bronze man more impressive than a building. (If you want to make someone look like the Lord himself, my advice would be to make him Big, his right arm raised high, his hand upturned, focusing the blue lens of heaven.)

When Attila and I turned the corner from Andrassy Avenue onto Dozsa Way, at first I thought we'd come to the wrong square. On Stalin's pedestal stood two boots the size of boilers, but no Papa.

"There!" Attila said, clapping his hands and hooting. We ran like mad toward the pedestal. Attila hooted again and jumped.

Stalin lay toppled behind his high stone bastion. He was entangled in ropes and chains, like a colossus hoisted from the sea. But his big bronze boots still stood. Rope ladders hung from them.

There were few other people in the square, surprisingly few, but they covered their open mouths when they saw what we saw and scrambled away, as if the fallen god's dark angels were still hovering, were about to take revenge.

But Attila was fearless. He pulled me along like a dog toward the fallen father.

A shot rang out, dinging something. I checked the windows all around the square, the trees, the moving shadows. A good breeze blew through the trees. Another shot pocked the pedestal.

My brother's tone sharpened. "Come!" he said. "Hurry." He was several rungs up one of the rope ladders. "Come!" he barked again.

I followed him. We scrambled up the sagging ladders. Who could have invented such a thing? I banged my elbow on the stone, scraped the knuckles of my left hand.

Attila was already on top. Several Russian soldiers came running toward their bronze leader from the other side.

Attila helped me reach the top of the pedestal. "We have to get inside."

"Inside what?"

"The boots. One each. There's a ladder up the far side of that one. You take that. I can get up this chain."

"We're going inside the boots?"

Attila was hoisting himself up the chain, deftly coordinating his hands and feet like a monkey.

I began to clamber up the second ladder. "What are we doing?" I grunted.

"We'll be like Mother Goose. We'll be the Brothers Goose."

Attila waited and watched me. Once I made it to the lip of the boot, I was surprised to see how cavernous it was inside, taller than I was. My brother gestured to me to raise the rope ladder — hoist it up with all my might — and let it fall inside the boot. I watched him do it first with his chain, then I did mine. The ladder was surprisingly bony and heavy. I stupidly avoided the ladder on the inside and instead slithered down into the boot, though I was not the best slitherer, and took quite a fall to the bottom, landing against my shoulder. I'd heard my brother sensibly drop feet first in his.

What now? I was quaking, suddenly taken with a chill, my teeth chattering. I looked up into Stalin's blue heaven. I was overcome with dread that we would soon become the Brothers Corpse, that it would have been a more glorious death to have been strung up in the Oktogon, that if we were to come out of this alive, my father would beat us, as he must.

I wondered suddenly where Stalin's bronze socks might have gotten to before I came to a conclusion I was not proud of: it was that Stalin had no actual feet, at least not this Stalin.

The inside of the boot darkened for a moment, and I distinctly remember thinking what a good idea clouds were, not to mention rain. I wondered if clouds had been an aesthetic choice or a practical one. And what about rain? My brother always questioned whether things had been created or had evolved, but I didn't care quite as much about that. For me, at the time, the difference was only a matter of gradual development versus sudden appearance. Though I struggled with such generalities, I was less concerned about them then and more interested in the mere fact of them. What, I wondered, must it have been like to be the first person to experience rain? What are these? There's a heavenly river and it is breaking up. These are shattered shards of river. Bits of river. Bits of lake. Lake beads. River beads. What is going on? Am I going to shrink or expand or drink or drown?

A shot clanged against my boot or Attila's. My teeth clattered like mad, like something loose inside me, a box of buttons.

Then just as suddenly a calm settled over me like a gossamer net. I recall with great clarity that very moment inside the boot. Was this the end? Would they find us in these boots? Would Attila jump out like the warrior rebel he was and take the bullet he was born to take? Would the Hungarians come to finish Stalin and complete their triumph? Would the Russians come first and fill the boots with concrete instead, monuments to Stalin's stalwartness? If they found my brother and me, would they make examples of us, chain us to the boots until the vultures came to peck out our eyes? Was there honor in that? And what was the protocol, the order, of killings? Soldiers first? Then civilians? Men first? Then the elderly? Then women? Finally children? And what was the cutoff mark? Was my brother still considered a child?

The soldier of the Oktogon dangled before my eyes like a clear statement, and I knew that Attila and I would not die like legends but like jokes, the Brothers Grimm without a tale, our family shaking their heads, not allowing our names to be uttered again.

I could not hear Attila in his boot. I wanted to call out to him but felt it best to stay quiet. I edged my way into the dark front of the boot, to where Stalin's toes would have been, and then I heard Attila loudly whisper my name. I crawled out from the toe, and he was there at the top of my boot. He must have pulled himself up. "Let's go, my tender love," he said. "It's all clear."

"How do you know?"

"Look at me. I'm not being shot at." He climbed down into my boot and hoisted me onto the rope ladder, urging me up before climbing out himself.

We flew down Damjanich Street and almost ran into a tank clattering to the right of us. I now saw that these beasts bruising around the streets were not meant to be stealthy or subtle. They were not even vehicles, more like instant buildings plopped down in the middle of the street, daring you to pass.

A squad of young men and a single young woman, a brunette with a determined look on her pretty, red face, turned a corner and came toward us. They were chanting, "Szabadsag! Szabadsag!" — Liberty! Liberty! — and waving a Hungarian flag with its familiar bars of red, white and green, but with the Communist insignia at its center cut out of it, leaving a hole.

More shots were fired from somewhere, clipping the stone face of a building. The squad of young people scattered. My brother grabbed me by the shoulder and yanked me into a doorway guarded by two stone lions. They stood on their hind legs, holding up the entrance, seeming to hold up the whole building. Sometimes it was angels who watched over an entrance; sometimes shapely stone maidens. But these were lions. It must have been a very heavy building. Stone lions will do things for you that real ones won't.

We waited several minutes, waited for quiet, before tiptoeing out. Attila and I veered swiftly to the left until we got out to Rakoczi Street. I could not catch my breath — I didn't even want to try. I could breathe later, I told myself. I found myself hoping we might see our parents again, and Klari, and my friend Zoli, possibly. Up ahead, a man stood calmly outside the Urania Movie Theater. He was dressed in a brown gabardine suit and wore a matching brown fedora. He was lighting a cigarette, turning away from the wind that brought us. The Urania was white and had Moorish windows. It always beckoned like a foreign land, like an exotic Arabian bazaar laden with wild and exquisite gifts, gifts with horns and warm gems.

We caught up to the man just as he exhaled his first full puff of smoke, just as a shot sounded, taking off his hat. For a stark and childish moment, the Baby Diviner growing inside of me traced the path of the bullet through the man's head as it knocked over everything in its path: his day, his night, his next puff of smoke, his dinner plate of veal paprikas, his smiling daughter holding up a glass to the light to see if it was cracked, his wife entering the dining room with the wine, wiping a damp hand on her apron.

The bullet might as well have struck us too, my brother and me. "Let's go!" Attila snapped. He pulled me straight through the doors of the Urania Theater, the white doors splattered now with blood.

An unsuspecting young woman, no bigger than a fawn, sat in her ticket booth. She smiled at us.

I was gasping, panting. "A man has been shot," I said.

"A man?" She rose with a creak from her chair to look out, raised her hand to her heart to protect it. "Oh," she said. The hand went to her mouth. She started to cry, but silently, sobbing, hiccupping.

"This way," Attila said.

"What?" she said. She was still looking outside. She could see blood on the glass.

"Now!" snapped my brother. "Now," he repeated, more gently. He was pointing into the theater, the promised darkness.

My teeth were clattering like a box of nails now, not buttons. The fawn girl's white skin had turned blotchy, suffused with fright, her eyes wide and a crazed white. To escape the hunter, the fawn pattered to the front of the theater near the screen and straight out a side door. I thought we were going to follow, but my brother pulled me down low into the seat beside him.

There, in the darkness, Tarzan unleashed a sound like a jungle aria. The Urania was showing Tarzan the Ape Man. The theater was majestic with its tall Arabian arches. A young couple sitting in a private box above us ignored Tarzan and Jane. They were making a meal out of each other's ears and lips. Would their love wither when they found the fallen man outside? Would Tarzan have helped the man in the brown suit?

Attila stared at the screen.

So that was the plan? We were going to sit now and watch a movie? We ran away from home, we hid in Stalin's boots, we saw a man shot, and now we were going to watch Tarzan the Ape Man? We saw a real man's head explode, but now we'd watch Johnny Weissmuller swing through the trees? There was an absoluteness to events as Attila experienced them. It is sleep time, and now I will sleep. It is eating time, and now I will eat. It is ducking into a theater time, and now I will duck. Once in the theater, I will watch a movie, which is what we do in a theater.

I could not draw a single satisfying breath. Tarzan fought a lion. Jane was pretty. Tarzan swam with crocodiles. Jane loved Tarzan. Tarzan trumpeted through the jungle. Cheetah cringed. But where was Kaiser Laszlo? Where was the man in the brown hat? Who would carry him away? What time was it? Had the Russians expelled our parents? Did our parents think we were dead?

"I'm going," I said, and got to my feet. Attila couldn't take his eyes off the screen. "I'm going," I said again, and began to march to the front of the theater, where the fawn had disappeared.

Attila slapped at the armrest but followed. I took a last look up at the solitary couple in the box, but they had no interest in anyone else, in the world beyond their faces. Attila heaved open the side door with his bum. The sun's yellow smack blinded us, but we ran through it toward home. A cool wind blew up from the Danube flecked with dust and leaves, but soon enough we could make out the familiar landmarks of our neighborhood and let down our guard a little. It was not until then that I finally found the meat of the air and took in a good gulp of it.

I stopped for a moment. "Why did they shoot the man with the brown hat, Attila?"

"I don't know," my brother said. He took my hand.

"What was the man doing?"

"He was lighting a smoke."

"And he got shot for that?"

I stopped, but Attila pulled us along. "Not for that," he said. "For stopping where he did, for being a standing target, for sport."

We got home just ahead of the Russians, who were late. When we slipped through the door, we were met by our father. I'd never seen him in such a fury. He was a snorting bull. He lifted Attila by the collar of his shirt, a mighty act, since my brother was almost full grown.

"You Russian!" Attila shouted at him.

Simon banged Attila up against the wall. But the matadors swooped down on them: my father's cousin Andras, his wife, Judit, our grandmother and mother. My father let Attila down but raised his fist at both of us like a biblical figure.

Our mother slipped between the raised fist and my brother's golden head.

"Don't hit them!" Judit said. She embraced her own swollen abdomen. She gasped and looked ready to faint. "Oh," she said to her belly. She staggered back into the living room with the help of her husband.

Lili, our mother, hugged and kissed my brother and me strenuously, squeezing too hard. "My lambs, my lambkins," she said.

Klari stood behind her. She looked especially disappointed, disappointment to equal my father's fury, as if her faith in life had been shaken, her faith in love.

Just as she hugged me hard too, Attila broke free, bellowed like Tarzan, pounded his chest and flew off to our room. I lost my breath again. My heart took off without a runner. The dead man in brown rose up in front of me, and I started to sob and shake. My grandmother sobbed with me, then my mother too, the three of us swaying together and sobbing.

My father snorted and slapped at his sides. "We have to go."

"Simon," my mother said through her tears, "we have our sons back."

"Great," he said. He slapped at his sides again. "We have to go. Now!"

We went to get our few things. Upon returning to the vestibule, we could hear Judit in the living room with Andras. "Are we just going to get on the train, just like that?"

"That's what we're going to do," said Andras. "Don't worry, dear, please."

"And the Russians will let us?"

"They're distracted just now, but not for long. They'll send in reinforcements, and when they do, we'll be stuck here. Our baby will be born here and grow up here."

"Is that so bad?" Judit whispered. "We grew up here."

"It will be bad, worse than we have known."

A short while later, Andras and Judit joined us in the hall. We were all leaving together, Andras and Judit included. They had brought their bags to our apartment, as well as a rolled-up carpet, a very old Persian one featuring a bird of paradise, which they treasured.

Minutes later, the Russians came, not a friendly group like the first one, and they pointed the way outward, out of our home.

New hire to supply more brainpower

Hockey Canada. Manager of operations, analytics and video expected to bring 'analytical mind'

Hockey Canada doesn't want to fall behind the rest of the sport in the analytics department.

That much was clear with Wednesday's hiring of Misha Donskov as manager of hockey operations, analytics and video. Donskov will be primarily tasked with video responsibilities, but Hockey Canada president and CEO Tom Renney believes the former Ottawa 67's associate coach has more to offer.

"I think there's an opportunity to tap into his knowledge with respect to analytics and what might (be) best to measure, whether it's on-ice performance, whether it's how we put our camps together, whether it's the numbers of people we put in our camps," Renney said in a phone interview Thursday.

"He has an analytical mind, and having said that, he certainly pays attention to the analytics of the game. I think there's lots of ways and means with which to incorporate his skill to that end."

Analytics go beyond traditional statistics such as goals, assists and plus or minus to measure things like puck possession, quality of competition and where players are on the ice.

Donskov replaces Andrew Brewer, who left his job as Hockey Canada's video coach to join Mike Babcock's staff with the Detroit Red Wings. Babcock heaped tons of credit on Brewer during the Olympic gold-medal run in Sochi for ensuring Team Canada was well-prepared along the way.

Brewer got some analytics started before he left, and that's where Donskov picks up. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Rasmus powers Jays' sweep of Rays

Pinch-hitter Colby Rasmus homered in the 10th inning and the Toronto Blue Jays earned their first three-game sweep at Tampa Bay by beating the Rays 1-0 on Thursday night.

Rasmus led off with a long drive into the right-field seats against Steve Geltz (0-1).

Tampa Bay had runners at first and third with none out, and the bases loaded with one out, in the ninth. But reliever Brett Cecil (2-3) worked out of the jam by striking out three in the inning. Casey Janssen got three outs for his 21st save.

Toronto won the first two games of the series to stop a streak of 22 consecutive winless road series (including one in Orlando) against the Rays dating to April 6-8, 2007.

McIlroy in 3-way tie for BMW lead

Rory McIlroy ran out of par saves and had to settle for a 3-under 67 and a share of the lead Thursday in the BMW Championship.

McIlroy appeared to be on his way to building a big lead at Cherry Hills when he made four birdies in a five-hole stretch around the turn. A pair of bogeys late in his round left him frustrated.

Jordan Spieth made two late birdies for a 67. Gary Woodland joined them at the top.

Henrik Stenson was at 2 under playing his final hole. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Nishikori making Japanese fans proud

U.S. Open. Men's 10th seed faces top-ranked Djokovic in semifinals after back-to-back five-set victories metro AR Kei Nishikori celebrates defeating Stan Wawrinka in the quarter-finals of the U.S. Open on Wednesday in New York. Scan the image with the Metro News app for this week's best photos from the final Grand Slam of the year. STREETER LECKA/GETTY IMAGES

Kei Nishikori's run to the semifinals of the U.S. Open was hailed back home as a "win for all of Japan".

Nishikori became the first Japanese man to reach the U.S. Open semifinals in 96 years by outlasting third-seeded Stan Wawrinka of Switzerland 3-6, 7-5, 7-6 (7), 6-7 (5), 6-4 on Wednesday.

Japanese tennis fans woke up at dawn to watch the quarter-final and were rewarded.

"It was a spectacular win for all of Japan," said office worker Toru Miura.

"We haven't had a lot of success in men's tennis over the years."

The previous Japanese semifinalist at the U.S. Open was Ichiya Kumagae in 1918. No man from the country had made it to the final four at any major tournament since Jiri Satoh at Wimbledon in 1933.

"It's really impressive," Japan Tennis Association (JTA) director Masaru Uchiyama told Sports Hochi newspaper. "It was truly inspirational to watch as he came back after dropping the fourth set."

The 24-year-old Nishikori, the first Japanese player to be ranked in the ATP's top 10 after climbing to No. 9 in May, faces No. 1 Novak Djokovic on Saturday.

Wednesday's four-hour, 15-minute win over the Australian Open champion Wawrinka came a day after Nishikori defeated Milos Raonic in a fourth-round match that lasted more than four hours.

"Even though he was tired he fought hard to the end," said JTA director of strengthening and development Minoru Ueda. "Let's hope he can get another win."

On to semis. Cilic sends Berdych packing: 3-0

Marin Cilic
GETTY IMAGES

Marin Cilic wasn't allowed to play last year in the U.S. Open, forced to the sideline by a four-month doping suspension that he says he didn't deserve.

Home in Croatia, he set about improving his game and his fitness, eager to be a better player when he returned to the tennis tour. Now, he figures, that time off from competition is paying off on the court.

The 14th-seeded Cilic reached the second Grand Slam semifinal of his career, and first since 2010, by beating sixth-seeded Tomas Berdych of the Czech Republic 6-2, 6-4, 7-6 (4) Thursday at Flushing Meadows.

"I mean, it was a difficult period. I didn't know when I'm going to start back. But (it) was also (a) good period for me," Cilic said, thinking back to 12 months ago. "I matured a bit more and I was working day after day. I wasn't relaxing and doing nothing. So I think that helped me to improve physically. Also, it helped me to have enough time to put some new parts in my game, which are helping me to play this good now."

Cilic, a former top-10 player, tested positive for a stimulant after a match in Germany in May 2013, and the International Tennis Federation sought a two-year ban. He said he ingested the substance unintentionally via a glucose tablet bought at a pharmacy. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Horoscopes by Sally Brompton

♈ Aries
March 21 - April 20
Don't concern yourself too much with details this weekend. Life is too short to worry about what may or may not happen. Besides, why should you exert yourself when important needs have been taken care of?

♉ Taurus
April 21 - May 21
The next few weeks will be special for you, and for those who are special to you. Even people you think of as rivals or enemies will be more amenable than usual.

♊ Gemini
May 22 - June 21
Venus, planet of values, urges you to be a bit more understanding of someone who has let you down. Almost certainly they didn't mean to.

♋ Cancer
June 22 - July 23
The planets will bring you into conflict this weekend with someone you usually get along with. Everything will be OK if you resolve to get past it quickly. You have too much to do to waste time on petty vendettas.

♌ Leo
July 24 - Aug. 23
If you need to approach someone for financial assistance then do so this weekend, but don't automatically assume they know what it is you want. Chances are they are unaware of your troubles.

♍ Virgo
Aug. 24 - Sept. 23
Venus moves into your birth sign this weekend, boosting your confidence. You will be glowing with happiness over the next few days and others will feel good being near you.

♎ Libra
Sept. 24 - Oct. 23
You want to move up in the world, of course, but try not to be too pushy over the next 48 hours or you could undo a lot of the good work you have done in recent weeks. You will be judged mainly on how you help others.

♏ Scorpio
Oct. 24 - Nov. 22
You cannot go on trying to achieve everything alone. With Venus moving into the friend area of your chart this weekend, making alliances will come easy.

♐ Sagittarius
Nov. 23 - Dec. 21
If you need to ask someone in a position of authority for a favour, this is one of the best times to approach them. They are in a charitable mood.

♑ Capricorn
Dec. 22 - Jan. 20
Travel is very much on your mind and it's quite likely you will be going somewhere distant or out of the ordinary. Contacts with foreigners are especially helpful at this time. You could even end up working abroad.

♒ Aquarius
Jan. 21 - Feb. 19
You should be feeling a lot better about your financial prospects now that values planet Venus is moving into the wealth area of your chart. But don't take too much for granted or you may spending too much.

♓ Pisces
Feb. 20 - March 20
Love planet Venus in your opposite sign will bring relationship issues to the fore — in a nice way. If you're single, you may connect with someone compatible this weekend.

You deserve credit from someone who's credible.
